Back up for later The design of backup apps has always seemed a bit cryptic to understand. Macrium Reflect's interface is not the most minimalistic, but it does the job insofar as it clearly shows you what can be done and how it can be achieved. Upon booting the app, the thing you first notice is probably the drive section, which shows your disks and their available storage. By way of using the menu on the left, users have the option to clone a drive or more on their machine, along with the capability of creating an image file for Windows' back-up and restore function. There is also a backup solution for files and folders, but that can only be accessed via the Home edition. Restore and create bootable images Aside from the features mentioned prior, users can also restore their drive image through the app. Doing so will make Macrium Reflect create a new partition of that particular image, fully accessible through File Explorer and/or the app itself. An option to clone a specific disk is also available. This facilitates transferring your data to a new storage unit to a great extent the fact that you can clone an entire drive, which you can boot up and view in File Explorer, is great to have when you're looking to backup your stuff. Macrium Reflect is a solid app. It has a few paid tiers that empower the app even further, but the free version offers sufficient features for the casual user looking to protect their data. It has been found that the methane content of landfill gas is roughly one fourth that of natural gas, and that the volume is roughly three fourths that of natural gas. As a result, it is significantly more expensive to process and transport methane-rich gas from landfills than it is to transport natural gas. Additionally, the amount of energy derived from methane-rich gas from landfills is roughly four times less than the amount derived from natural gas. As a result, methane-rich gas from landfills is typically not produced for sale, but rather, landfills are cleaned up with conventional methods such as using landfill gas to heat the landfills. Despite this fact, many landfills in the United States are now producing methane-rich gas, to improve the biodegradation of the waste material, and to reduce the potential of fire or explosion. The methane-rich gas from landfills is typically produced using a so-called venting system, in which fresh air is periodically vented into the interior of a landfill to replace the air within the interior of the landfill. As the fresh air is vented into the interior of the landfill, the spent air from within the landfill, including the methane, is vented out of the landfill, and subsequently, captured and processed for sale. Typically, these systems are referred to as "bioretention" systems, as the goal is to provide a favorable environment for the biodegradation of the waste material in the landfill
