In my testing, adjustments like Radial Filter can be anywhere from simple to able to use Photoshop on RAW files, and none of the AI-based tools are at all affected by the strict Camera Raw Action Rules or any other quirks relating to the Sidecar mode. Adobe Photoshop 9.0 is a huge update that builds on a series of successes made over the past several years, and it's hard to believe that in a time of rattletraps, expensive software, and dwindling photo sales, this is a major release. Create a Custom Action that runs some or all of a Photoshop action set. With Photoshop PSD's increased size, it's easier to enable more than one action at a time, even from a complex action set. For example, you can find dozens of ways to warp images, rotate, and fade them. You can also automate the process of finding and joining files based on patterns. Also, save your own textures as custom actions that are much, much easier to save and recall than the "Load Smart Object" processes. The stage is now taken by apps, each with its own tools, approaches to optimization, features, and technical approaches. Lightroom, for example, had a dramatic difference in technical approach compared with Photoshop. I don't think that PhotoImpression will ever mimic the full range of capabilities (nor does it need to; it does the best possible job in how it's been made). However, it's just one app. A previous version of Photoshop (CS5) had a similar endeavor with "Photoshop Elements." This is very similar to the strategy of Lightroom, Photoshop, and Blackmagic Design's DaVinci Resolve within that family of products. This category of "innovation" within the family of products reminds me of the "Game" on the iPhone and iPad. These are all viewed by most in the photography industry as "me-too" products. This is being done to move us away from just "Photoshop" and "Lightroom" and beyond. Anyone who's been following my reviews for the past decade knows that it takes great apps, to provide great value. Experienced shooters don't just need a shooter. They need a whole field of skills. A good app should have enough employability to help people in ways we haven't even imagined yet.
